From data-directed drug discovery to rational drug development and drug delivery. Rational drug development is a new approach to drug discovery, which aims to design and develop new molecular entities (NMEs) more effectively and efficiently. This new paradigm is based on molecular simulations, molecular mechanics and combinatorial chemistry, and at its core is the use of chemical descriptors to model physico-chemical properties and biological activity. An example of a rational drug development is the concept of the "hit-to-lead" strategy, which begins with the identification of a lead compound or scaffold with optimal activity, usually determined by cellular assays or target validation. In the case of a known drug, a "lead-to-drug" strategy can be used. The NMEs are designed to possess specific bioactivity that can be incorporated into a pharmacophore and molecular modeling/computational studies. The novel drug is then advanced to the preclinical (animal) and clinical (human) levels for safety and efficacy testing, and ultimately to market. We describe in detail some of the approaches in the hit-to-lead and lead-to-drug strategies, and conclude with some comments on the future of drug discovery. It's easy to think of your business as a hardworking machine that is singularly focused on your success. If you're doing your job well, the machine is churning out profits that you will be able to use to grow your business and do something amazing with. While that is a valid perspective, it's an incomplete one. Part of the reason that many of us find it so hard to think like a machine is that our brains are wired to think about the things we care about. It's not just that you care about your business, your colleagues and your customers, either – you're literally also wired to think about food and sex. These two interests are particularly powerful in the human brain, with each of us having some sort of genetic predisposition towards the use of certain foods as pleasure, and
