WHEN he died of brain cancer, Colin Batch had problems with his memory. For years he recalled being sexually abused as a child when an adult, but he had no idea it was in April 1980. “He confessed to me that he’d had a sexual relationship with a girl, which was quite traumatic, but he had no idea it had happened that long ago,” Mr Batch’s mother, Margaret, told The Sunday Telegraph. “I was in touch with him all the time about that - there was only him and me.” A statement of reconciliation was drawn up for him by solicitors, but he signed it under the name “Peter”. Mr Batch, who was 47 when he died, died at home on September 12, 2014. He had a tumour in his parietal lobe, left behind by a brain tumour that originated in the womb. Margaret said she discovered the extent of her son's "debauchery" when he was in his 20s, but he still wanted her to be the one to tell him about it. "I realised something had gone on when he mentioned that he'd been abused by a girl," she said. "He'd been raped by a girl." Mr Batch was apparently embarrassed to make this admission, given the nature of his new relationship, but he did tell his mother. "It was a shock, but as he got older he became more comfortable with that situation," she said. Margaret remembers Mr Batch as a "highly educated man", who
