The estimation of antigenicity is usually determined by the response obtained after the introduction of a given amount of antigen into a given host animal. The human body has a limited capacity for protein absorption, and the rates of absorption of proteins of different protein content differ markedly. The measurement of the antigenicity of a molecule is therefore not a simple matter. In addition to the reaction of the host animal, it should be noted that the introduction of a given amount of antigen to the host may result in a non-reactive response only if the drug is subjected to denaturation. The reaction of the host should therefore be followed by a study of the process by which the host reacts with the introduced protein. This is particularly important if the drug in question is to be applied to human beings. The maximum amount of antigenic substance that 09e8f5149f
