Lithiation of Metal-Free NO Radical via Weak Electrophilic Lithium Reactions. A method for the indirect lithiation of NO radical with 4,4,5,5-tetramethyl-1,2,4-dithiazole-3-nitroso-1,2-dithione (TMTD(2)N) is reported. Coordination of NO to the dithiazole ring provides an NO radical adduct, which undergoes C-S cleavage in the presence of n-BuLi to afford a lithium sulfide product. The nitroso sigma-donor accepts one equivalent of the second lithium reagent at a time. Metal-free reactions of NO with less nucleophilic reagents, such as tetramethyltin and t-butyltin bis(trimethylsilyl)amide, also generate the lithiated lithium sulfide complexes. These reactions afford metal-free products comparable to those from lithiation of pre-formed complexes.No, I'm not talking about a new book about Tesla Motors or the latest Tesla-themed detective novel, but about the promised solar roofing tiles. Tesla is now partnering with solar installation service SolarCity to offer a prefabricated solar roof in the form of solar panels. The tiles will be manufactured by SolarCity and installed by Tesla technicians. The whole thing sounds great, and if it works it's going to cause a huge change in the way the electricity market works. While it's true that the manufacturer pays the installation company, the installation company can still make quite a bit of money selling the installation to the end consumer. In California, where SolarCity is located, the electricity market is almost 100 percent deregulated, meaning you can buy electricity from whomever you want. Although you have the option to buy power directly from the utility, in order to receive a discount you have to sign a long-term contract. What this means is that if you choose to install panels yourself you can set your own price. Either way, SolarCity will bill you a flat rate, much like you would with your cell phone, gas, or electricity bill, instead of charging you by the kilowatt. Tesla's newest solar roof uses Panasonic's solar panels, which are what you would use if you were going to put panels up yourself. Sadly, it's going to be a while before you see a roof like this on your

Q: How can I improve the first-person perspective of this map? I'm very new to map making and game design. This is a map I made with Photoshop and Unity3D but it isn't looking very polished and it makes me feel like I don't have a good grasp of level design. How can I make the map look better? Here are some pictures to give you an idea of how it looks now. I'm working on a different version that will have more detail and more quests to add, so I'm not sure if this is possible to do in Unity3D. A: The camera might not be quite what you want it to be. I don't know enough about Unity to tell you exactly what's wrong, but I think the reason why the close-ups are not drawn in the right order on the left hand side might have something to do with it. Also, with the scene itself, it looks like you have a lot of dark, empty space on the right hand side. I'm not sure what kind of lighting you have or how it's set up, but it might be easiest if you adjust the camera so that it is a bit lower than you have it here and a bit closer to the middle of the map. The camera can be set in Unity3D under: 3D -> Camera -> Field of View Also, with the camera, there can be a tradeoff between how much the camera is zoomed out and how close it is to what's in the scene. I don't know exactly which values you can set at the top of the camera settings, but it might be worth it to set the camera to about mid-range and see if you can't get it to look better this way. Finally, you could consider editing the map in Photoshop, rather than Unity. Q: How to get the current selected index in ListView in Android I want to get the current selected index of a ListView. I tried: list.getSelectedItemPosition() But it returns me -1 and 0 even when the list is not selected. What is the best way to get the selected index? A: As you specified this question is related to Android programming using Java, ListView is only part of a complicated architecture and only one among other components interacting with one another. All the more it is necessary to separate the selection
