The purpose of this study was to evaluate the effect of physiological changes in the nasal airway on airway resistance and upper airway volume in the supine position. Ten healthy volunteers were examined in the supine position with and without nasal decongestant spray and with and without nasal clearance. Nasal airway resistance, upper airway volume and nasal airway resistance--upper airway volume correlations were determined. Without nasal decongestant spray and with nasal clearance, nasal resistance was reduced. When nasal decongestant spray was administered, nasal resistance was increased. The nasal airway resistance--upper airway volume correlation decreased significantly when the subject was not decongested and
