Orion's first manned test flight, launched in 2014, suffered major engine and parachute problems during its ascent. But NASA recently revealed an improved backup version of the spacecraft's heat shield, raising hopes that the second test flight -- set for late 2019 -- will succeed. While sending someone on the first ship to Mars seems like an elaborate idea, the journey to the Red Planet isn't something new. There have been multiple plans and experiments by various nations, most notably the Soviet Union, back when the space age was in its infancy. NASA is currently developing the first robotic mission to Mars in the 2030s and has long-term plans to establish a human outpost there, but human astronauts have not yet stepped foot on another world. [Spaceward Bound! The Weird, Weird History of Planetary Exploration] If the "Red Planet II" mission succeeds, the astronaut would be one of two crew members (along with a ground control team) on the first interplanetary spacecraft. When would this mission be? NASA is planning to launch the Orion spacecraft around Sept. 5, 2019. However, astronaut Doug Hurley, who served as one of the backup crew members for NASA's first Orion test flight, said in a recent interview with space news site GeekWire that launch will occur around Dec. 17, 2019. Ishmael Fuller, who helped NASA's Orion spacecraft safely land on a floating platform in the Atlantic Ocean in March, will fly aboard the second Orion test flight. (Image credit: NASA) In June 2019, NASA launched an uncrewed test version of the Orion capsule from Florida on top of an Atlas 5 rocket. A 1.6-million-pound heat shield was attached to the capsule to catch falling debris; the capsule and heat shield (which was built by the agency in partnership with private companies) hitched a ride on top of the second stage of the rocket to reach an altitude of more than 14,000 miles (22,300 kilometers). The capsule and heat shield reentered Earth's atmosphere on Feb. 25, 2020. Follow Dor 595f342e71
