I thought it would be better to return some specific parts of the file and I have created a function that does this for me. However, I want to check if the new php file exists - if it does I want to send the user back to the form that sent them to the php file that is generating the new content. I have a function to do this as I thought it would be easier to do this check and then just change the output rather than keeping the whole php file - I thought an easier method would be the following: However this isn't working as the file is not being generated in the first if statement - any help on why this isn't working would be really appreciated. A: Let's assume your file-tests.php contains the following: d0c515b9f4

After I did that I am still able to see the Request Id (autogenerated) displayed when I go into "Other Settings". I do not see my custom field either. But the Request Id still shows up. I am the administrator for this App. How can I remove the association of this (otherwise useful) field? The field I am talking about is called "System Name". A: The field System Name is associated with the object Request: Account and the label Account System Name. The auto generated ID is actually the ID of the record related to the request: Object. You can manage the association of custom objects (in your case of Request: Account) via the standard tools for standard objects (which are accessible by Developers). The standard Workbench navigation menu will appear when you click on any custom object. The "Customize" menu will display a list of the custom objects already associated with that record: (This screenshot was obtained by clicking on Custom
