"Ah, Hello, I'm Mister Mysterious from the special effects staff of 007. Special effects include computer-generated imagery (CGI).Q: Minimum number of words in a sentence This is a question I'm having a hard time thinking how to go about. I am writing a new document. In this document I have to include the word count of the most complete sentence I can find in the NLP area. I am in the planning stages now and want to take a stab at it. I figure with the right way of thinking it will be a simple problem to implement. The objective is to take any piece of text, like "Hello how are you doing today?", and make it into a full sentence. I have the idea that it can possibly be done by creating a list of most common words and then reading the text and picking the first word. This comes across as being too simplistic, but I can't seem to come up with a better thought process. Is there a way to get a word count of the most complete sentence? A: This kind of stuff is traditionally hand done, e.g. using a big pile of copies of the text to find the best sentence. You might try going through the text as follows: Split the input into a list of words using some built-in way in your favourite language (e.g. split(str.lower(), " ") in Python). Build a table of possible candidate words, e.g. key: (word, count) pairs. Ideally, you'd handle all regular cases (e.g. using word(str.lower())), and maybe even some of the irregular cases (e.g. using word(str.lower(), "?,* '")). Go through the table and compare each candidate word against the input. The best match is the one where the count is the highest. This should give you the most complete sentence. I'd recommend not starting to work on this now. There are many details, particularly about handling the case 1cdb36666d

Contenis: CEO/Trainers:Teaching German Business Apple accused of conspiring with Foxconn over $38Bn factory According to the Wall Street Journal, Apple has been accused of conspiring with Foxconn, the Taiwanese manufacturing company behind much of the company's hardware, to hire a lesser skilled and therefore cheaper workforce for jobs in China. News of the agreement came with reports of a Foxconn plant in the northern part of China overflowing with iPhone 6 devices, despite the fact that the popular Apple product was only launched last Friday. The company has since denied the accusations. Earlier this year, it was reported that Apple had agreed to pay Foxconn $3 billion as a result of its efforts. This agreement was reached in August. The complaint filed by the Electronic Frontiers Foundation on Tuesday alleges that in June 2012, Apple CEO Tim Cook wrote a letter to Foxconn chairman Terry Gou, asking for more iPhone factories in China, and also that Foxconn told Apple that it could not commit to the installation of new factories in China without them first being licensed by the country. Cook wrote the letter with a view to a meeting with President Hu Jintao, the paper said. Foxconn had worked for 14 months to meet Apple's manufacturing needs, the paper reported, and hoped to be granted access to what it called Apple's "exclusive sauce", a method of ensuring only the highest quality products reached the consumer. Apple has denied the claim and said that the Foxconn agreement was "no more" than a standard service contract. "All Apple
